

Undergraduate Research Assistants for the Global Poverty Research Lab

The Global Poverty Research Lab (GPRL) plans to hire several undergraduate Research Assistants to help conduct a series of literature reviews at the intersection of entrepreneurship, gender, and/or economic development. Tasks will include one or more of the following: searching for literature, coding articles and extracting statistics, and data management and analysis. Participating students will have the opportunity to gain familiarity with the literature, development economics research methods, systematic review/meta-analysis research methods, and policy analysis. Candidates should be proficient at reading quantitative economic articles, identifying research designs and main findings, and interpreting statistical analyses.

If you are interested in the position, please email Andre Nickow (a-nickow@kellogg.northwestern.edu) a resume/CV, unofficial transcript, and a brief statement of a few sentences or short paragraph about your interest in development.
